Following a groundswell of public protest, the university said it would allow online applications for freshman students from California high schools starting in 2019, a first for an institution as large as UC. California senior, UCLA and UC Berkeley students have been vocal in their opposition to the move, claiming that California has not historically had strong high school mathematics and science standards and that online admissions are inferior to the in-person experience. But UC has worked for years to shift to digital education, with the university testing the boundaries of its online education in recent years, converting its Blackboard learning platform to an Apple platform, developing a suite of tools for the creation of online courses and pushing open access and the free sharing of university instructional content. California's students back online application plan to protest to state education commission Read more The new move could, according to some critics, be the latest step in that direction. "It's not that [online admissions are] a bad idea," said Raphael Sonenshein, executive director of the California Institute for Digital Learning, which has been working on digital-based curricula at the UC and California high school levels. "It's that, given the incredible cost of sending students to
